

Sales Page Creation

First step... get a checklist of the sections to create along with their importance:

Step 1: Know what sections to create (Checklist)

Importance:

High

Mid

Low

Items:

Hero

Sprinkles of Social Proof Methods

Featured in

Personal Adchievements

Statistics

...anything that could be an direct advantage without framing

Copy Sections (the glue)

Social Proof Section

Text Testimonial Sections

Video Testimonial Sections

Case Study Section

Who is this for

What is this

Sneak Peak Sections (different from sneak peak because shows meat)

Feature Sections

Objection Handle Sections

CTA (what to do next)

Give a reason why you're giving this out

If you really work hard to make your offer good... your reason has to be pure... no one would work so hard on an offer "just for money"

Scarcity Section

Guarantee

Included Bonus Sections

P.S

FAQ

Disclaimer on the Footer

Pick the most important ones.. depending on the important of the sales page you may do some or all of them, it's most important from top-bottom to middle... in other words... the most important of the highest priority is the disclaimer on the Footer (in legal terms) and the Hero Section (important for selling), and so until it gets to the least important at the middle.

Step 2: Just Write

Write over multiple sessions, all the sections.. spit out everything that comes out and don't worry about structure.

Important note: don't edit stuff yet.

Here's how you want to organize it... here's all the sections that involve copy:

Copy Sections (the glue)

Case Study Section

Who is this for

What is this

Feature Sections

Objection Handle Sections

CTA (what to do next)

Give a reason why you're giving this out

If you really work hard to make your offer good... your reason has to be pure... no one would work so hard on an offer "just for money"

Scarcity Section

Guarantee

Included Bonus Sections

P.S

FAQ

You want to unite all these sections on a story... it can a long term story... it depends on the sales page size... it can also start with being your story and then you switch to another person when giving a case study section for example, that's totally possible.

You want to connect the story to your product, main reason is: people let their guard down on stories, because they are not being pointed at or judged... they are not the main character.. they can just listen.

But coming up with stories is hard, as such, you can use steps and lists... that is lists... when you have a creative block... but they are significantly worse... so I'd strongly recommend you to take your time creating a story that you are proud of... give a 3 days rest without seeing it... read it again and ask yourself: is this story good?

After connecting to a story, step by step system or list, then make your product around 1 strategy that is completely mind changing, I do find that self descriptive names on strategies work best.

You want to put all the other sections between and make sure that they make sense there but actually highlighting you'll them in... or they make of the story:

Sneak Peak Sections (different from sneak peak because shows meat)

Text Testimonial Sections

Video Testimonial Sections

Featured in

Personal Achievements

Statistics

...anything that could be an direct advantage without framing

Of course, certain section require a specific type of writing.

☐ Guarantee Framing

Imagine your guarantee is: "if you don't [get result] in XYZ time we'll you your money back two fold."

The way I go about this is:

Look, you have to options... you could continue to gain weight [the specific pain point they have increases if they continue] risk free, or you could come with us and try to lose it also risk free.

In the first scenario you'll have to spend months to figure it out, jumping from free tutorial to free tutorial, from diet to diet... with a doubt on the back of your mind if you'll ever get fitter.. in the best of cases you figure it out with effort... in the worst of cases you look at the scale, only to be more disappointed of yourself.

In option 2 you'll take us on... and you'll take our hand and you only need to go about your life, workout once a week, and eat what we tell to cook... on the worst of cases... you get 2 times the money you pay us... on the best of cases, you become the most handsome guy in town...

This offer is not forever... you have to pick, of course... no presume.. if you're worried about something... be it your spouse or something else: just book a call with us and we'll figure it out.

☐ FAQ & Objection handle section

The FAQ is basically an automatic objection handle, there are real questions... most are objections... use a tool such as gong.io to find out about prospect's objections, then you can put the top 5-7 on the FAQ and flip them into a feature.. you can address as much as you like in the objection handle sections too.

☐ Bullet Points

You want your bullet points to be like headlines while transmitting a feature... focus more on the benefit they have from the benefit of the feature... and less on the actual feature.. in fact, you can just not mention the feature and make "how-to"s or something like that.

☐ P.S

Here is where you want to focus a lot of your attention on... making it good comes down following the copywriting principles I'll tell in the editing stage and summarizing everything in a very engaging way...

Split test this area the most and remember: scientific split testing: once you find out what works best.. your next question is why.

☐ What is this & Who is this for Sections

This can be just a bullets... but I mean a shit ton of them.

☐ Hero Section

Ok here's not hard... if you want you can add something called "eyebrow copy" to introduce the offer or audience.

Then you call people out with the headline...

You further justify with the deck copy, most popularly known as subheadline

☐ Scroll Stopper

A title of a section is a scroll stopper, and for people who just scroll to the end... they need to be self-descriptive enough that they get the whole point of a section.

Step 3: Edit

Now that it's time to edit I will give you some technical information. However before that... Make sure that your story makes sense and you do not contradict yourself...

I found out that after being writing for a while your brain goes into autopilot mode and then you make mistakes you only realize while actively reviewing.

Make sure that you frame it around one thing. Is that over with? Are all the sections there? Do you every asset you need to create the sales page?

Great, let's move on... first thing and most important that we must fix is your story... we need to be sure that the storytelling is OK...

☐ Avoid Saying "Story"

Hearing the word "Story" triggers a negative expectation sometimes.

Instead say:

- Case
- Experience
- Event
- Example
- And so on...

☐ Start the Story Strong

80% of your attention should be given to the beginning of the story to get the viewer's attention.

Techniques:

- Jump into action right at the start.
- Ask a question to make them think & connect.
- Use a cliffhanger

☐ Structure

The story should be 1-2 minutes long. And it should have a predefined structure.

Now, for stories that are this small, I don't recommend the Hero's journey, I recommend what's above this text, Freytag's Pyramid.

If you don't know what the "Hero's Journey" is... it's for movies and very large shows... we're creating a sales page... let's keep it simple.

- Exposition: First, give the context (who, what, when, where)
- Inciting Incident: Include the incident that led you to change
- Rising Action: Mention the increase in stakes, danger, or negative emotions mixed up.
- Climax: Mention the main action that brought it all back to being ok — here's the most important point to introduce the story.
- Falling Action: Tie up Loose ends on the story while relating to your offer — the key lesson to learn out of the story — frame it as something you learned.
- Resolution: Include the key takeaway from the story.

☐ Build Anticipation

Waiting → Craving → Desire, that is the sensation of dopamine, you want to create that in your story.

Make them dying to find out what happens next.

1. Sell your story → Get them hooked
2. Mini-Cliffhangers in the story (raises anticipation)

☐ Bring Characters to Life

You need to know someone to feel sympathy for them.

Describe physical characteristics.

Clothing

Body Types

Things that stick on your audience's mind

Quirks and traits

Habits

Dream & Fears

What drives them

What they are afraid of

☐ Make it Emotional

People don't remember what you said, they remember how you made them feel.

To make the story emotional...

Share your thoughts:

- Hopes
- Dreams
- Fears
- Desires

Show Emotions through...

- Physical expressions
- Behavior & Attitude

- Metaphors, comparisons, analogies.

☐ Act out Key Moments

Techniques:

1. Show Action

Replicate it while telling.

2. Show Reactions

Don't suppress reactions

3. Dialogue

Try to impersonate the other character involved

☐ Break Expectations

The moment your audience knows where the story's going, they'll start thinking about other stuff.

Unusual reactions, events or activities.

Add unexpected twists & resolutions to make it unforgettable

☐ Turn up the Heat

Raise the stakes over time → the higher stakes, the more intense and engaging the story is.

1. Share emotional goals

2. Show impact on others (how other people are affected by the hero's actions & what happens if the hero succeeds or fails)

3. Introduce time pressure (deadline / time limit)

☐ Show the Change

Change in character is the difference between stories people forget and stories that stick.

You need something that resonates with the viewers and where the main character undergoes a change.

Show the change, do not tell it.

After editing your story to match each of these principles... it's time to check for language problems...

Copy paste your copy to hemingway.com, on the top right corner there is a meter that measures the grade level of your copy.. if you scroll down you'll see the highlights...

These highlights can be many things, from shorter alternatives to certain phrases and words, to break down sentences...

And please do break them down...

Unless your audience is a law firm (which I know it's not) people like simple, short and sweet.

Try to make your copy sentences have one comma, if there are two commas, you can usually cut the middle or make 2 sentences.

There will also be highlights for adverbs... Avoid Adverbs Whenever Possible. These words don't add meaning to sentences and they can even weaken it's message.

If you don't know what adverbs are.. I didn't pay attention to english class too, it's words like: very, super, way, actually, etc..

Then there will also be a highlight for the passive voice... the active voice makes stuff easier to read, so switch from passive to always using active.

Your goal is to get below 3rd grade level... copy that is understood by everyone doesn't mean it will be childish but that your thoughts will be conveyed.

Do that for your whole copy.

Then... let's go over some more copywriting principles:

☐ Use the present voice:

The present voice is more engaging than any other voice:

- When you're creating your sales page ❌
- When you create your sales page ✅

☐ Positive Language

Negative language only work when people trust you, and even then, using it can make you lose trust, people are overreactive to negative language... and might rebel to it's commands, so use positive language:

Don't leave the facility ❌

Stay inside ✅

☐ Remove Unnecessary or Redundant Words

By adding in words that are useless to the sentence we reduce the average value of thing we're transmitting... think of it.. by increasing the percentage of trash in a city we make more trashy, each scrap counts...

So we want to eliminate each thing there is about this:

He was able to get out of his car. ❌

He exited his car. ✅

We simultaneously left the building at the same time ❌

We left the building at the same time ✅

☐ Avoid Generic Language

"I was driving down the highway" — No, shows no information about the character.

"I was driving 120mph down the chicago highway in my 1998 toyata corolla" — Shows much more about you as a chracter

Substitute any generic words. Add unique details:

"She was smart" — no

"She could solve a rubics cube under one minute" — yes

Use metaphors, analogies, etc... You have an idea of what your prospects understand right?

But use this strategically & make sure sentences don't get too long — sprinkle them across your copy.

You also want to use them in something the prospect doesn't understand,

Grab that what the prospect understands (which you should know from research) and use analogies and methaphors to pain a picture inside the their heads...

It doesn't need to be ultra descriptive.. let them fill in the gaps...

But they should have a clear understanding of topic they didn't understanding before by using the analogy or methaphor.

☐ Show, don't tell — Even better: Show and Tell

Show it all — they should feel the story is happening to them. Depending on the situation, if it's a video, you could also have a voice-over telling what you want to communicate beyond showing.

Show, don't tell techniques:

- Use dialogue
- Show through action

Use physical movements and behaviors to showcase emotion

- Show through metaphors, analogies and comparisons

Connect something they don't know to something they do, this is one of the most effective way to make your audience learn something,

Even better, make the metaphor or analogy appeal to different senses. Just don't be over descriptive.

"he was a chaotic person" — no

"he was new york city highway in person" — yes

If this were a video, you'd be able to show and tell.